Transactions made by the Applicant after the Bank's "trading hours" are considered to be transactions made on the following business day. The actual time of transaction for a remittance will be the following business day. The Applicant agrees that for next-business-day remittance transactions, the Bank may debit the amount after the "trading hours" of the prior business day to the actual date of execution. The cumulative amount of the deposit will be based on the foreign exchange rate applicable at the actual time when the Bank executes the transaction and counted on the effective day. If the balance of the Applicant's account is below the amount of the outward remittance when the Bank executes a next-business-day remittance, the Bank reserves the right to not execute the next-business-day remittance.
